

RILEY'S HARD LUCK

His Recent Find of $1,250,000 Claimed by the Crown.

Copyright, 1911, by the Brewster Company. Great Britain's Treasury, and not the Athlone, will benefit by the latter's discovery of a treasure of an old manor of £200,000 in the built in the thirteenth century in Jersey.

Thus, when some years ago a quantity of Roman silver and gold coins and rings, in excellent condition, representing the reigns of twelve Roman emperors of the beginning of the Christian era was found by laborers engaged in digging on the Earl of Pembroke's property at Wilton House, his ancestral home near Salisbury, he and his relatives turned over the entire lot to the Treasury.

At the time the coins were found, the Treasury department, as is customary in the case of the discovery of a treasure of an archaeological or historical character, submitted the coins to the British Museum, which retained all the rings and thirty-six of the rarest of the coins for that world-famous national institution.

Subsequently Lord Pembroke wrote to the Treasury requesting that the remainder of the coins should be returned to him, with the object of enabling him to divide them between the museum and county museums of Salisbury.

At the time the coins were found, the Treasury department, as is customary in the case of the discovery of a treasure of an archaeological or historical character, submitted the coins to the British Museum, which retained all the rings and thirty-six of the rarest of the coins for that world-famous national institution.
